

ARTFORUM

MARCH 2009

CRITICS' PICKS: MUNGO THOMSON

by Colby Chamberlain

Mungo Thomson, Untitled (Margo Leavin Gallery, 1970-), 2009, Super 16 film, 5 minutes 11 seconds, installation view.

Today there are more 16-mm projectors in New York's galleries than in its movie theaters, and it's common to blame this profusion of celluloid on a nostalgia-fueled vogue for obsolete technologies. Two 16-mm pieces at the core of Mungo Thomson's solo exhibition suggest a more compelling possibility: that only now, at analog's twilight, can we appreciate its heretofore unnoticed quirks. In the digital era, transposition—the twisting of one medium into another—comes easily; the zeros and ones move fluidly from one format to the next. Thomson's films demonstrate that transposition among analog technologies, by contrast, is an intuitive operation, depending on slant rhymes and producing unlikely resonances. In The Varieties of Experience, 2008, Thomson takes Nam June Paik's 1962-64 Zen for Film—a blank white reel with only some accumulated dust to differentiate the frames—and turns it into a negative. Thus reversed, the errant dust specks become flickering stars in a night sky, and Paik's original now harks back to August Strindberg's 1890s celestographs (photographic plates where Strindberg mistook a chemical processing error for the revelation of distant cosmos). In Untitled (Margo Leavin Gallery, 1970-), 2009, Thomson hones in on the curious affinity between film reels and Rolodexes. Brought to life by Gumby-style stop-motion animation, the Rolodex flips through contact cards like so many film frames: The instruments of social networking become an instance of montage. The Rolodex in question, owned and maintained by Los Angeles's Margo Leavin Gallery, bristles with notable names that leave an afterimage. CASTELLI, KOSUTH, SARET JUDD: The index of a textbook on post-war American art goes flashing by, complete with phone numbers, and a vanishing world comes into view.